HISTORY:

Many Baby Boomers raised in rural or emerging suburban America owned a Western Flyer bike, red with chrome handlebars and fenders. Maybe we also had a Western Flyer red wagon used to pull our important stuff round the neighborhood, or careen down the hills of the tar covered roads. Or a Western Flyer sled with its thin metal runners that we would grease with an old wax candle to go faster over the snow and ice. The Western Flyer brand came from the Western Auto store on the local town square—a place of exciting toys, furniture and appliances, and of course, anything your dad or older brother needed to keep the family car running.

Founded in 1909 by accountant George Pepperdine and run as a mail-order auto parts supplier from his Kansas City kitchen, the Western Auto Supply Agency thrived and grew. He sold after-market parts needed to keep the Ford Model-Ts clacking—if you owned a car in those early years you would either pay someone to keep it running or you became a tinkerer adept at changing tires, sparkplugs, and an occasional transmission. With the opening of the first retail store in Kansas City in 1913, Pepperdine branched out to other products and was innovative in marketing specialty brands unique to his catalog and new stores. In 1915, for health reasons, Pepperdine sold his Kansas City operation to Don Davis, but moved to California and established a second Western Auto Company serving the west coast (these two companies eventually merged again in 1955).

Under Davis and his successor managers, Western Auto became a household name that at its peak had over 3,000 stores throughout the county supplying families those Western Flyer bikes, wagons, and sleds; the Truetone radio, and later TV, line; and many other Western Auto brand items. Much of this success came from the creation of the Western Auto Associate Stores beginning in 1935. Unlike Wal-Mart of today, the Associate Stores were home-owned by members of the community, who agreed to sell a minimum of Western Auto Supply Company brands, but were also free to stock other goods. This gave the Associates the best of both worlds—a reliable and reputable identification with a national chain and the independence necessary to meet the needs of local customers—"Locally Owned, National Known" read the Company motto. Western Auto not only grew an impressive market-share, but also a dedicated and loyal workforce. The Company newsletters were filled with articles and items about employee events and families shared with the Western Auto "family".

The world changes, and by the 1970s Western Auto began to fall behind its growing number of competitors, such as Sears, Wards, and Ace Hardware. Management tried to reposition the Company, even to the point of abandoning the Western Auto "Circle Arrow" logo that had identified it since the 1930s. More disastrous was a change in the franchise relationship that supposed that the Company knew better what would sell than the local Associate owners. Dissention resulted in the loss of Associate stores and a Company unable to focus its energy to meet the competition. By the late 1980s, Western Auto was a shadow of what it once had been and in 1988 it was purchased by Sears—its long time arch rival. Over the next ten years Sears stripped away several of the Western Auto product lines, including the Tire and Battery lines, and then sold the rest to Advance Auto the year before its 90th anniversary.

On October 6, 2003, Western Auto dealers got word that on December 31st Western Auto Supply Company would cease its wholesale operation. Only 300 stores remained and this was too few to sustain the Company. Western Auto was no more.

As early as 2002, the Research Center-Kansas City had received records and other materials from retired and former employees of Western Auto. Early in 2004 came the call to come pack up the records and other materials in the Company offices and SHSMO-KC staff responded with boxes and carts to move approximately 36 cubic feet of photographs, catalogs, publications, scrapbooks of advertising, artifacts of display items, correspondence and working files on Western Auto stores. This last are "dossiers" on many of the Associate stores including photos, advertising, and brief histories.

The book, The Last Western Flyer: the Western Auto Century by Jim Marchman (Blacksburg, VA: Jim Marchman, 2004) insightfully details some of the lessons learned from the Western Auto enterprise. The Western Auto Supply Company Records (K1233) now with SHSMO-KC allows the researcher to focus on individual stores, employees, and management and marketing practices in greater detail.
