George Cresswell (1796-1871) emigrated to the United States from his native England in 1821. After living briefly in Pennsylvania he brought his family to Washington County in the new state of Missouri. There he acquired large holdings of land and became involved in farming, lead mining and smelting, flour milling, and the mercantile trade. His home and business activities eventually were established at Aptus, on Mineral Fork Creek about ten miles north of Potosi, the county seat. Today the Cresswell house and ruins of the lead furnace still stand and are owned by a descendent of George Cresswell.

The Cresswell papers include correspondence, land documents, legal papers, slave documents, tax receipts, account books from the furnace and store, miscellaneous business papers, local school records, and other family papers.

The correspondence folders (1-7) contain letters from George Cresswell’s relatives, most prolifically his father and brother, who remained in England. They are concerned mostly with family matters, but there are also interesting observations on economic and social conditions in early Victorian Britain. Other letters deal largely with Cresswell’s business affairs, although there are some letters from relatives in the gold-mining areas of California.

The land, legal, slave, and tax papers (Folders 8-24) contain useful information on the extent of the family’s property holdings.

The furnace account book (Folder 25) includes records of “Lead Hauled to Selma” (1853-1854) and mineral received, smelted, and shipped to Aptus (1868-1876). The store ledger (1868-1874) and business papers (Folders 26-38) detail the family’s commercial dealings with local residents and St. Louis, Missouri, wholesalers. Especially valuable are records of the Cresswells’ accounts with Chadbourne & Forster of St. Louis, who marketed the lead produced at the Aptus furnace.

Also in the collection are papers of George F. Cresswell, M.D., concerning economic and social conditions, and especially the welfare of child laborers in Washington County’s “tiff” diggings, during the Great Depression. There are also nineteenth century clerk’s records from Washington County school district #1.
