These are telegrams sent and received by Col. John B. Gray, commander of the Union post at Pilot Knob, Iron County, Missouri. The dispatches include communications with district headquarters at St. Louis, and with detachments throughout southeastern Missouri, especially those at Fredericktown, Patterson, Van Buren, and Barnesville. The telegrams cover the period from November 1862 to April 1863.

Located south of St. Louis at the end of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad, Pilot Knob was one of three strategic railhead installations through which Federal military effort was directed during the Civil War in Missouri. Union armies operating in southeastern Missouri and along the Missouri-Arkansas border were supplied and reinforced via long lines of communication stretching back to the railhead at Pilot Knob. The post also stood squarely in the path which would be taken by any rebel forces attempting to advance on St. Louis through southeastern Missouri. Sterling Price's Confederates followed this route in their invasion of Missouri in 1864, battling the Union defenders of Pilot Knob at Fort Davidson.

Although the post was included as part of the Military District of St. Louis, Pilot Knob was of sufficient importance to rate the assignment of a colonel or brigadier general to its command. The First Regiment of Missouri State Militia Infantry, commanded by Col. John B. Gray, was stationed at Pilot Knob in September 1862 and Gray was named to command the post, which also included guard stations along the Iron Mountain Railroad at Mineral Point and Sulphur Springs. Gray remained at Pilot Knob until March 1863, when he was promoted to brigadier general and appointed Adjutant General of Missouri.

Mrs. Pollie Hollie, the archivist and historian of the Immanuel Lutheran Church, where the telegrams were found, located the Pilot Knob telegrams. Records of incoming and outgoing dispatches were kept separately and in chronological order, although there is some mixing of the two types of telegrams, and there are some irregularities in dates, especially in March and April 1863. A few dispatches are missing where pages were torn from the original volume.

The telegrams concern routine military business at the post, and were not published in The War of the Rebellion: Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies. There are many communications with commanders of the St. Louis district, generals John W. Davidson and Eugene A. Carr, and several concerning operations of the Army of Southeast Missouri. The dispatches concern transportation and troop movements, prisoners, deserters, spies, and noncombatants moving through the district. One interesting exchange of telegrams concerns the wife of Confederate Colonel John Q. Burbridge, who was moving south through Federal lines to visit her husband in Arkansas. She was stopped and searched twice by army authorities who were convinced that she was carrying rebel mail. The telegrams also include communications with garrisons at Fredericktown, Van Buren, Patterson, and Barnesville, details on an attempted mutiny by the Second Missouri Artillery at Pilot Knob, and reports of a skirmish with six companies of guerrillas at Bloomfield, Missouri. A complete roster of the telegrams can be found in each folder.
