INTRODUCTION
The National Women and Media Collection (NWMC) contains speeches, newspaper columns, advertising campaigns, articles, interviews, and audiovisual material from women in the media as well as media organizations.

DONOR INFORMATION
Consult the reference staff about donor information.

HISTORICAL SKETCH
The National Women and Media Collection Project is a joint venture of the University of Missouri School of Journalism and the Western Historical Manuscript Collection. Marjorie Bowers-Paxson—MU graduate, longtime newspaperwoman, and retired Gannett publisher—established the NWMC in 1987 with a monetary donation and the gift of her own papers.

The National Women and Media Collection Project documents the roles women have played and are playing in media fields, both as media employees and as objects of coverage, how those roles have altered over time, and how attitudes of and towards women have changed. The NWMC includes the records of women’s organizations and the professional and personal papers of: female journalists—reporters, correspondents, and columnists; educators—professors of journalism, mass communication, public relations, and advertising; editors and publishers of newspapers and magazines; radio, television, and film producers and personalities; press secretaries; public relations personnel; and advertising associates. These papers document the professional lives of women working in media fields, coverage of women’s issues, the women’s press, news by and about women, media stereotypes, gender and race discrimination, portrayal of women in advertising, national and international women’s conferences, and activities of women’s organizations.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE
The National Women and Media Collection consists of items from various women and organizations that were too limited in scope to consider as separate collections, and includes audiovisual as well as manuscript material. The collection is arranged alphabetically by the name of the person or organization.
